Steelcase Expands Relationship with Uhuru

Alliance offers designers and customers access to more of the company's iconic "new American" design through the reliable Steelcase dealer network

Today Steelcase and Uhuru, a Brooklyn-based furniture design firm, announce plans to expand their relationship in North America. Building on Uhuru's successful offering on Steelcase Marketplace, Steelcase will now offer customers the full Uhuru product portfolio, inclusive of Uhuru's line of contract furniture solutions. This relationship complements the extensive Steelcase portfolio that gives customers easy access to more choices with delivery by the largest and most reliable dealer network in the industry. The collection of Uhuru's ancillary furniture will be available this fall with the complete contract line available at the beginning of 2020.

"Since launching our relationship with Uhuru last year, we've heard from architects, designers and clients that are eager to have complete access to their furnishings. We're delighted to bring the distinct, bespoke and high-end aesthetic of Uhuru products to more workplaces around the world," said Joel Schellhammer, vice president of partnerships and integrations. "This expanded relationship provides our customers with convenient access to a breadth of design choices, supported by reliable, commercial distribution."

A Brooklyn-based "New American" furniture design firm, Uhuru Design specializes in custom residential and high-end commercial furniture made with reclaimed materials. "We are excited to expand and grow our partnership with Steelcase to bring our entire collection to all areas of the workplace," said Jason Horvath, Co-founder and CEO. "For the last 15 years we have built collection after collection by finding and designing around materials with rich histories, whether it be salvaged Coney Island boardwalk planks or reclaimed Kentucky bourbon barrels.

We're thrilled more organizations will be able to access these kinds of storied designs in the workplace." Steelcase collaborates with a diverse network of forward-thinking partners around the world.
